

Business Owner Advisory

Selling Your Business? What's Next?

- Success at starting and growing a business doesn't necessarily mean an owner will be prepared for the next chapter in life when the business is sold.
- Business owners commonly report feeling adrift and a loss of purpose and identity following their transition away from the business.
- By preparing in advance for life after the sale, an owner can be equipped to launch into this next chapter of life with a greater chance for positive outcomes.

For business owners and entrepreneurs, building your business is a pursuit of passion years in the making. You worked hard, dedicated your time and energy, and planned for the future of your business. Being a business owner is an all-encompassing effort, and it's easy to forget about what comes after amid the day-to-day of running a business.

Exiting the business you spent so many years building is a big decision, and it comes with equally big changes to your day-to-day life. Whether you're just starting to think about making your exit or the wheels are already in motion, here are some ways you can start planning for that transition to ensure that your post-exit life is just as fulfilling as running your business.

WHAT TO EXPECT IN YOUR POST-EXIT LIFE

The idea of selling and exiting the business creates a sense of excitement about what might be next. But the sale may also instill a feeling of uneasiness at the uncertainty that follows.

Yet, one thing is certain about the future. All businesses will go through a transition. When that transition does happen, it pushes you into a new chapter of your life — one that comes with new challenges and new opportunities.

Here are some of the most common challenges business owners face when they first enter post-exit life:

Loss of identity — You and your business were deeply entwined, and it's common for business owners to tie a big part of their personal identity to their work life. Who will you be once the business is sold?

Loss of purpose — Your personal goals and the goals of your business were one and the same. What goals will drive you forward into this new chapter?

Feeling adrift — You made deep connections with employees, suppliers, customers and partners, and your business and social lives constantly overlapped. What will you do with your time, and who will you spend it with now?

Loss of validation — You worked hard to earn the respect and status that came with owning and running your business, and you were rightfully proud of that. Where will you find that pride and validation when it's no longer coming from your skills as a business owner?

It is completely normal to experience challenges when going through any major life transition, and as a business owner, this transition will be one of the biggest you will experience in your life — but you don't have to go it alone.

For many owners, their “business family” is as much a part of their lives as their actual family, and leaving them can be as heart-wrenching as watching your children leave the family home and embark out on their own for the first time.

MANAGING THE TRANSITION AND FINDING SATISFACTION

As a business owner, you had strategies for dealing with any number of challenges facing your business. Many business owners focus on preparing the business for sale but overlook their personal readiness until after the deal is done, often to their detriment.

Now that you're moving into post-exit life, you will have to confront new challenges and emotions. Here are some strategies you can use to help manage that transition and find true fulfillment in your new life:

DEFINING YOUR PURPOSE

In your life as a business owner, you may not have spent much time thinking about personal goals that weren't somehow connected to the business, and that's ok. You had a business to run and metrics to hit, but now that those days are behind you, having clearly defined goals for your post-exit life can help add purpose and direction to your life.

If you are just starting to think about transitioning away from your business, try to take some time now to think about these things if you can, so you can get right to enjoying your life when the transition eventually happens.

As you work toward setting personal goals, allow yourself the time to reflect on and experiment with what brings you satisfaction. You may not have had much time to think about what brings you personal joy and excitement before, and doing so now may take time.

Begin thinking about your purpose and how to fill your time before you sell. Entering this next chapter of your life without an idea of how you can spend your time will contribute to you feeling adrift and may ultimately lead to dissatisfaction with your decision to sell.

MANAGE YOUR FINANCIAL SECURITY

For many business owners, the sale of a business will be one of the biggest financial events in their lives. It will also likely mean transitioning from living off what you earned from your work to living off the proceeds of your exit.

Unless you intend to be a serial entrepreneur, you will only sell a business once, and the sales proceeds need to last.

Setting financial goals can also be a helpful place to start. Think through the life you want for yourself and your family now that the business isn't a part of it. Consider defining your financial priorities and how they fit into your living expenses, income, investments and other assets.

Engage with your financial advisor before you exit your business. Your advisor will be able to help you form a plan for your finances and give you a realistic picture of where you stand. They can also advise you on areas of interest including post-sale liquidity and cash flow, estate planning, charitable giving and your legacy.

FOCUS ON YOUR FAMILY

Exiting the business will naturally impact members of your family as well as yourself.

Some of these impacts will be positive, like having more time to spend together and potentially having the financial resources to live a life you've always wanted.

Some impacts will be challenging – exiting the business may mean cutting off an income stream for family members who were receiving income or benefits from the business, and for those who are connected to the business, they may feel the loss of your presence in it.

Coming to terms and adapting to your new family life, and potentially, new family dynamics, can be a challenge. Even simple things like how much time you have together can be a challenge at times.

While you may have been working extraordinarily long hours each week, your spouse built a life of his or her own in your absence. Don't expect your spouse to drop everything now that you are available.

Including your family members in your plans early on is one way to help manage these challenges. This decision impacts them in many ways, and it's important to consider them when building your plan. Having those conversations early on in your planning can help alleviate some of these issues when you make your exit for good.

DEFINING YOUR SOCIAL LIFE

Exiting your business can mean having more free time to spend with friends, family and loved ones. It can also mean spending less time with the social connections you made through your work.

If you were working full time, you likely intermingled your work family and your personal life. You may have had more social engagement through work than the personal friends you occasionally saw on the weekends. You will need to invest in expanding your social network and making new friends. This is not always easy in the later stages of life.

Having a picture in your mind of what your social life will look like post-exit is a big way you can avoid feeling adrift. Whether it is golf, playing cards, volunteering, mentoring others or something else entirely, you will need to put yourself out there to reconnect with the friends you didn't have enough time for in your working days, or meet new people and develop meaningful new relationships.

MANAGING YOUR TIME

Throughout your career, your days had a certain structure. However, without an office to go to and a business to run, that structure will be gone, and you may initially feel like a fish out of water. It is easy to let time slip by.

Consider ways you can introduce some level of structure to your day-to-day routine, whether it's planning your social life, volunteering regularly or even just setting aside parts of your day for different activities.

In your working life, your schedule may have been so full you never realized just how many hours there are in a day. Filling those hours can be one of the most jarring parts of the transition, but proactively managing your time can help.

Finding ways to keep an element of structure to your days can be a helpful way to navigate the shift from the schedule of your working life.

START PREPARING NOW

Selling a business is a monumental change in your life. Routines and relationships will change, and some of the parts of your life that gave you direction will be gone. Just like running a business, managing your life post-exit requires planning and preparation. Taking steps now to prepare for the day when you leave your business will help ensure that the transition to your new life is as fulfilling as possible.

Reach out to your Financial Advisor if you are interested in learning more about how Rochdale can help.

IMPORTANT INFORMATION

The views expressed represent the opinions of RBC Rochdale, LLC (Rochdale) which are subject to change and are not intended as a forecast or guarantee of future results. Stated information is provided for informational purposes only, and should not be perceived as personalized investment, financial, legal or tax advice or a recommendation for any security. It is derived from proprietary and non-proprietary sources which have not been independently verified for accuracy or completeness. While Rochdale believes the information to be accurate and reliable, we do not claim or have responsibility for its completeness, accuracy, or reliability. Statements of future expectations, estimates, projections, and other forward-looking statements are based on available information and management's view as of the time of these statements.

Accordingly, such statements are inherently speculative as they are based on assumptions which may involve known and unknown risks and uncertainties. Actual results, performance or events may differ materially from those expressed or implied in such statements. All investing is subject to risk, including the possible loss of the money you invest. As with any investment strategy, there is no guarantee that investment objectives will be met and investors may lose money.

Diversification does not ensure a profit or protect against a loss in a declining market. Past performance is no guarantee of future results.

RBC Rochdale, as a matter of policy, does not give tax, accounting, regulatory or legal advice. Rules in the areas of law, tax and accounting are subject to change and open to varying interpretations. Any strategies discussed in this document were not intended to be used, and cannot be used, for the purpose of avoiding any tax penalties that may be imposed. You should consult with your other advisors on the tax, accounting and legal implications of actions you may take based on any strategies or information presented, taking into account your own particular circumstances.

RBC Rochdale, LLC. is an SEC-registered investment adviser and wholly-owned subsidiary of City National Bank.

Registration as an investment adviser does not imply any level of skill or expertise.

City National Bank is a subsidiary of the Royal Bank of Canada.

© 2026 RBC Rochdale, LLC . All rights reserved.

CAS00013701-12/25